Q: does automatically setting the property size in a View violate MVC pattern? i have a login view where in i want to show some textfields and a button, but i want the frame of the textfields to be bigger to show some more text. so to do this i'm going to set the frame size, i know i have to set it in the actionPerformed() method of my login view, but is this going to violate the MVC pattern because this isn't viewed by the model, it's just something that has to be done in the view class? A: There is a thing called the view has a responsibility. The view deals with the visual aspect of the model, knowing which properties to display and how to display them. The view is responsible for any information that the user must know at that moment (e.g. the score of the game, the price of the house or the position of the ball in the field). So if you set the size of the frame and hide other elements of the view it is not a violation of the MVC pattern. In contrary to that, in C# we tend to put things in models for re-use, so any information that we want to show the user on the screen should be part of the model. For example the list of users for a website can be part of the model of the user list page. But the window size, on the other hand, is just a visual information, so it should belong to the view layer. Two-factor authentication is a technique that verifies two usernames and passwords to log in a website. Most websites use a login form that requires a password, a username, and an additional step where they must submit a code sent to their mobile phones. The mobile app enables two-factor authorization. A user can be required to respond to a one-time password after logging in. Digital Two-factor Authentication (2FA) is one of the most common options to make sure logins are safe and secure. 2FA is a technique that requires that the device providing the one-time password, be physically in the same location as the device attempting to log in. This is known as a distance factor. The benefits of using 2FA means that if someone gains access to an account that was protected by 2FA, they will not be able to access it. Even if the password is reset with a new password, the user will have to
